GLOBAL PROBLEM

IN THE UK

NHS (National Health Service) staff who injure their backs in the course of their work cost taxpayers over GBP £400m a year according to a publication by the national charity BackCare.

This huge sum is made up of staff sickness, absences, and wasted training of those forced to leave their jobs as a result. GBP £400m is enough to employ 16,000 nurses for a year.

Each year, more than 80,000 nurses injure their backs at work and 3,600 healthcare workers are forced to retire early. Across the care sector handling injuries account for over a quarter of all reported injuries to employees.

IN THE USA

The annual cost of the problem is estimated at USD $26 Billion.

According to OSHA - Occupational Safety & Health Administration (United States Department of Labor) - one major source of injury to healthcare workers is Musculoskeletal Disorders (MSDs).

These injuries are due in large part to overexertion related to repeated manual patient handling activities, often involving heavy manual lifting associated with transferring, and repositioning patients and working in extremely awkward postures.

IN AUSTRALIA

The Health and Community Services sector employs 14% of the labour force with an incidence of serious injury 14% higher than all other industries combined.

In the six-year period 2009 to 2014, there were 52,064 accepted claims for work related injury between nurses and ambulance officers across Australia. More than three-quarters were female (77.2%) and the median age of workers was 45 years.

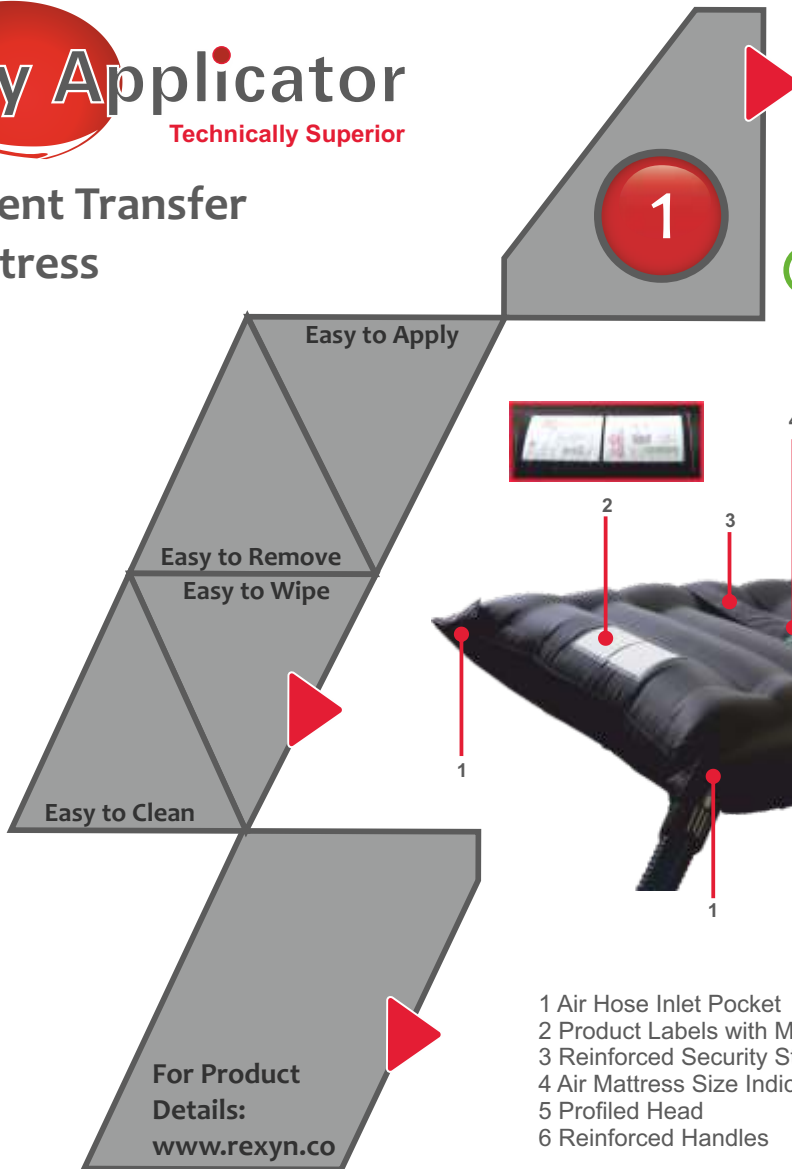

Nurses in hospital and health care services had 39 accepted workers' compensation claims per 1000 workers. Musculoskeletal injuries were the most common (41% of all injuries), followed by back pain/strain (30% of all injuries).
